

PROBLEM STATEMENT REPORT FOR “REMATCH”

ABSTRACT

Startups and recruitment agencies are inundated with excessive resume volumes per job, have limited time to review them, and have costly consequences for making a bad hire. Existing options for screening resumes are typically inadequate, uneven, inaccurate, and keyword-based. The by-product is mis-hired candidates, lost productivity, and top-tier candidates lost in the pile. Rematch plans to fix the resume screening and matching inefficiencies by utilizing a more intelligent ranking system.

PROBLEM STATEMENT

- Diversity and Inclusion Challenges: Companies have struggled with diversity and inclusion, often failing to understand how to achieve true diversity in the workplace. This has led to frustration among both hiring managers and candidates, as diversity is seen as a quota rather than a strategic goal.
- Remote Work and Flexibility: The shift towards remote work has changed the way employees want to work, with many preferring remote or hybrid models. This has created challenges for industries that require on-site work, as they struggle to attract and retain talent.
- Skill Shortages: Businesses across various sizes have faced significant challenges in finding the right staff for open positions, with skill shortages becoming a major issue. Research from AI Group indicates that the difficulty in finding suitable candidates has increased over the years, with large businesses experiencing a jump from 43% to 66% in difficulty within one year.
- Candidate-Driven Market: The job market has shifted to be more candidate-driven, with unemployment at low levels and more jobs available than candidates to fill them. This has made it harder for hiring professionals to find the perfect candidate, as the pool of qualified candidates has shrunk.

- Time-Consuming Process: Recruiters must sift through countless resumes, digging through paperwork and cover letters, making it very labor-intensive and hard to scale. Without standardized processes, this task consumes excessive time and resources.
- Inconsistency in Evaluation: Without clear, uniform criteria, recruiters may rely on personal biases or resume formatting, resulting in uneven candidate assessments.
- Difficulty Identifying Transferable Skills: Vague phrases like “worked with a team” don’t reveal true competency. Recruiters struggle to gauge real-world skills or adaptability from resumes alone.
- High Volume of Applications: Large candidate pools make it difficult to thoroughly review each resume, leading to potential oversights, even amid a sea of top talent.
- Limited Information on Resumes: Resumes are often only one or two pages, offering incomplete insights into candidates' capabilities, making accurate evaluation hard.

PROOF AND DATA

1. A reddit chatroom discussing "The Hiring Process Has Become Super Long and Unnecessarily Complicated Now. What changed?" which has 502 likes and 206 user opinions of problems they face. Which gives us a vast use case problems in the market:
 - The post criticizes how the hiring process has become overly long and unnecessarily complicated compared to a decade ago.
 - It used to take 1–2 interviews over 2–3 weeks, but now involves multiple assessments, video screenings, phone calls, several interviews, and months of waiting—often ending in rejection. The author argues this wastes time, doesn't reflect actual job competence, and is influenced by bias, quotas, and favoritism.

- They call for legislation to streamline hiring and express frustration shared by many others in similar situations.

2. FORBES: Misrepresentation and Fake Job Postings: There is a growing concern about misrepresentation in the job search, with many job seekers suspecting that companies post "phantom job" openings. This has led to a lack of trust among job seekers, who question the legitimacy of job opportunities.

- The job market is rife with dishonesty — nearly 40% of companies post fake job ads or use misleading practices. The most common types of fraud are “ghost jobs” (positions that are not really available), bait-and-switch tactics, or more innocuous, placeholder posts to build candidate pools.
- Job seekers should verify roles, ask forthright questions, and look for red flags.
- Hiring managers should be forthright and honest to build trust and not ruin their reputations.

3. This is a newsletter published on Nov 11, 2017, stating the job market has shifted decreasing unemployment which leads to workload for hiring managers.

- Management is often eager to hire immediately, and so are hiring professionals — 86% want their hiring tasks accomplished in an efficient and time-saving manner. But with the difficulty in finding qualified candidates and other challenges, efficiency is not always one of HR's strong suits.
- To deal with the pressure that comes with hiring, hiring professionals need to be strategic in their processes.

CONCLUSION

The modern hiring process is characterized by excessive volume, unclear resumes, doubtfulness, inconsistency in resumes, and even job postings that lack truthfulness, meaning the recruiting system is inefficient, resulting in wasted time, overlooked talent, and poor decisions. AI-enabled solutions like ReMatch provide a scalable, less biased, fast, and efficient means of recruitment by relying on semantic analysis, standard evaluations, and intelligent filters to find the best candidates faster and more accurately. Speed and precision matter in the current world of work, therefore, AI is not just an advantage, its necessity is required to modernize hiring systems.
